EQUAL SERVICE IN THE SENATE

West Virginia Republican and Democrat Parties Have Had.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 9—

While the election of two United States senators by the Democratic legislature of West Virginia, which meets within the week is attracting attention not only within the state, but throughout the nation, a review of the state's representation in the past in the Senate of the United States may not be out of place.

The election of two Democrats as senators will break the tie which existed prior to the death of Senator Elkins as to the term of service of Democratic and Republican senators respectively. For in the forty-eight years of the state's existence the aggregate term of Republican senators has been just forty-eight years and the aggregate term of Democratic senators has been the same.

While their terms of service have been of equal aggregate length, the Democrats have had seven senators, while the Republicans have had but five, making the average length of service of the Republican senators longer than the average for the Democrats.

Senator Elkins, with 16 years of service to his credit, lacking a few weeks, and two years more to serve when he died, had the longest term of office of any of the senators the state has had. Senators Davis, Faulkner and Scott, with twelve years each of service, rank next to Senator Elkins in length of service. Senator Kenna served ten years, his career being ended like that of Senator Elkins, by death, when he had two more years to serve. Senators Camden and Willey had eight years each of service, Senators VanWinkle and Boreman six years each, while Senators Caperton, Price and Hereford each served part of the same six year term. Mr. Caperton, who was elected to the senatorship, died, Mr. Price was appointed to fill the vacancy till the legislature convened and then Mr. Hereford was elected to fill the vacancy for the rest of the term.

When the state was formed in 1863, the first senators chosen were Peter G. VanWinkle, of Parkersburg, and Waitman T. Willey, of Morgantown. Mr. Willey drew the short term of two years and was elected for a full term as his own successor in 1865, serving until March 4, 1871. Mr. Willey, who was reckoned one of the great lawyers of his period, was a member of the West Virginia constitutional convention which framed the state's first constitution. He was a senator from Virginia under the restored government and when the new state was formed was a senator from it. He died May 3, 1900.

Serving with Mr. Willey was Senator VanWinkle. He, too, was considered one of the best lawyers of his period and territory. He was a member of the Virginia constitutional convention of 1850, and assisted in framing West Virginia's first constitution, as a member of the constitutional convention. He was a member of the reorganization convention at Wheeling in 1861 and took an active part in the formation of West Virginia. He died April 17, 1872.

Arthur I. Boreman, of Parkersburg, succeeded Senator VanWinkle in the Senate in 1869, being elected to the place while he was serving as the governor of West Virginia. He took an active part in the formation of the state and was president of the Wheeling convention of 1861 to reorganize the government of Virginia. Senator Boreman died April 19, 1896.

Henry Cassaway Davis, then of Piedmont, now of Elkins, was the first Democratic senator. He succeeded W. T. Willey in 1871. Starting life as a poor boy, working upon a farm and afterward as brakeman on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, he gradually engaged in coal mining, banking and railroad construction. He served twelve years in the Senate, retiring in 1883, since which time he has devoted himself to railroad building, coal mining, banking and other industrial and financial enterprises. He was nominated for the vice presidency on the Democratic ticket with Judge Alton B. Parker and now, at the age of 87 years, he is still active in politics and is looked upon as a senatorial possibility at the present time.

Allen T. Caperton, of Union, succeeded Senator Boreman in 1875, but died July 26, 1876. He was a lawyer, a member of the constitutional convention of Virginia in 1861, and served as a senator from Virginia in the Senate of the Confederate States. He died in Washington.

Samuel Price, of Lewisburg, who had been lieutenant governor of Virginia during the period from 1863 to the close of the war, and was president of the West Virginia constitutional convention of 1872, was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by Senator Caperton's death. He served only from December 4, 1876, till January 31, 1877. He died February 25, 1884.

Frank Hereford, of Union, who had served three terms in Congress, was elected by the legislature to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Caperton, and succeeded Senator Price, filling his seat January 31, 1877. He died December 21, 1891. Senators Caperton, Price and Hereford together served but one full term of six years.

Johnson N. Camden, of Parkersburg, succeeded Frank Hereford in 1881. Senator Camden started his career as a cadet at West Point but resigned to study law. He practiced his profession for a time, and then engaged in banking, and left that work to engage in the production and refining of petroleum products. He was active in business up to the time of his death. Senator Camden served for six years, leaving the Senate in 1887, but was elected to the Senate again in 1893, following the death of John E. Kenna, and served out the two years of his unexpired term.

John E. Kenna, the brilliant young lawyer and statesman from Charleston, succeeded Henry G. Davis in 1883, having served four terms in Congress prior to entering the Senate. He was re-elected for another term, dying in Washington, January 11, 1892. His statue stands in the statuary hall of the national capitol as one of West Virginia's distinguished sons.

Charles J. Faulkner, now one of the prominent lawyers of Washington, with his residence still maintained at Martinsburg, succeeded Senator Camden after a memorable contest in the legislature of 1887. He was re-elected at the expiration of his term and served till 1899, when he was succeeded by Nathan
